The Genesis: A Barren Landscape and a Vision

In the 1960s, Peter and Eileen Caddy and Dorothy Maclean arrived at Findhorn, a desolate and unforgiving landscape. Undeterred by its barrenness, they embarked on a daring experiment: to transform this seemingly inhospitable land into a flourishing garden.

With limited resources and a deep faith in nature's wisdom, they began cultivating the soil, planting seeds, and nurturing the nascent life that emerged. As they tended to their garden, they discovered a profound connection with the natural world and a sense of divine guidance.

The Blossoming of a Sanctuary

Despite the harsh conditions, the garden at Findhorn began to thrive. Vegetables grew in abundance, flowers bloomed in vibrant hues, and the barren dunes were transformed into a verdant oasis. The garden became a sanctuary for wildlife, attracting birds, insects, and other creatures that found refuge and sustenance amidst its flourishing ecosystem.

As the garden grew, so too did the community around it. People from all walks of life flocked to Findhorn, drawn by the allure of a place where nature and spirit seemed intertwined. They shared knowledge, skills, and a deep respect for the land, creating a vibrant and harmonious community.
