

Trauma in Global and Historical Perspective: The Ethnography of Political Violence

Trauma is a pervasive feature of human experience. It can be caused by a wide range of events, including natural disasters, accidents, violence, and abuse. Trauma can have a profound impact on individuals, families, and communities, leading to a range of psychological, physical, and social problems.

In recent years, there has been growing interest in the ethnography of trauma. Ethnographers have sought to understand the ways in which trauma is experienced and understood in different cultural and historical contexts. This research has shown that trauma is not simply a psychological or individual phenomenon, but rather a social and political experience that is shaped by the specific conditions of each society.
