However, Bruno's independent thinking soon clashed with the rigid doctrines of the Catholic Church. Inspired by the works of Copernicus and Galileo, he embraced the heliocentric model, challenging the prevailing geocentric view that placed Earth at the center of the universe. His belief in the infinity of worlds and the plurality of inhabited planets further alienated him from the ecclesiastical establishment.

Act II: The Inquisition's Shadow

In 1576, Bruno was accused of heresy and summoned before the Roman Inquisition. He faced numerous charges, including denying the divinity of Christ, advocating the transmigration of souls, and rejecting the authority of the Church. For seven years, he endured relentless interrogation and torture, steadfastly refusing to renounce his beliefs.

Act III: The Martyr's Fate

Despite his unwavering resilience, Bruno's fate was sealed. On February 17, 1600, he was sentenced to death by burning at the stake in the Campo de' Fiori, Rome. As the flames consumed his body, Bruno uttered his defiant last words: "Perhaps you who pronounced my sentence are in greater fear than I who am receiving it."

Epilogue: A Legacy of Free Thought

Bruno's death sent shockwaves throughout Europe, sparking a heated debate about the limits of religious authority and the right to free expression. His ideas, once condemned as heretical, gradually gained acceptance over time. In the 19th century, he became a symbol of rationalism and scientific progress, inspiring thinkers and activists around the world.
